Details of their encounter are sparse, yet tantalizing. Orwell described Green as "a little beauty" with "remarkable eyes" and "a perfect figure." Their conversation, though brief, touched upon topics of literature and language. Green, it seemed, had a keen intellect and a passion for writing.

As the waiting room emptied, Orwell and Green exchanged contact information, promising to meet again. However, fate had other plans in store. The outbreak of World War II disrupted their plans, and they were never reunited.

Orwell's fascination with Green extended beyond their fleeting encounter. In his 1949 novel, "Nineteen Eighty-Four," he immortalized her as the character Julia, a young woman who rebels against the oppressive totalitarian regime of Oceania.
